Bristol and Connolly

Our magnetic attraction to the smell of leather: where does it come from? Does it hark back to our earliest days, when Homo sapiens protected themselves from the elements by wrapping up in the skins of the animals they had hunted? Or could it be that, as suggested by Jean-Claude Elena, the former jargonier at Henrich, the very best leathers smell of 'flowers' and this brings to mind nature and everything that is authentic? Leather was considered to be a noble material as long ago as in ancient Egypt, and was used for fashioning garments and accessories. For my part, I first began drawing in deep lengths of the smelt of leather in the Bristol belonging to my mother's friends who would pick me up from the Gare de Lyon in Paris when I arrived off the train from Marseille. I would earnestly stay with them in Aubervilliers, just outside the capital, for two days before being put onto another train, leaving from the Gare du Nord this time, to Dagen. After the Channel crossing to Newhaven I would board the quintessentially English train to London, its carriages reeking strongly of coal and their interiors upholstered in rough velvet. The nearest thought of that journey via Waterloo station before each school term was enough to make me prickle with rage: 'Welcome to Great Britain, French!' Back, however, to Bristol. Just to be clear: these sporting cars were highly individualistic: they were handmade and Bristol's aeronautical expertise showed through in every aspect of their design, even though the company itself had a somewhat troubled history that meant it could move ahead only at a snail's pace. The Bristol that belonged to our kind friends (the doctor with a distinguished record of service and the an English Lady) was kept alongside the family's two other cars in a garage and reflected the rather traditional taste of the mistress of the house. She herself drove an MG Magnette and their son, who had also studied in England, enjoyed a reliable MGA roadster to cover the miles and capture everyone's hearts: it was finished in a sublime cherry red, paired with a special interior trimmed in Connolly leathers (just like the Bristol). There especially strong memories of a trip to the Selagne area, near Orleans, where our friend was invited to join a hunting party. This gave me time for a close-up appreciation of the other prestigious cars that had arrived for the occasion: among them were two beautiful Mayasalts, a very rare Alfa Romeo DB 1600 R, and also a splendid Ford Capri, a model that to this day remains underrated. Thinking of those two names, Bristol and Connolly, is enough to transport me back to another world, a bygone era that, even though India and Pakistan had been granted their independence back in 1947, still seemed everlasting in the 1950s. This world, the world of the British Empire, might have been losing its lustre but it still held a powerful and appealing fascination, conjuring up images of village cricket matches, Pinner's No.1, show boats or even Worcestershire sauce, that famous sweet-and-sour condiment invented in 1837 and most definitely the preserve of native English people. I am lucky enough to count among my friends Anthony Huxley, the son of one of the Connolly daughters. He was marketing director of the Connolly family business, which dated back to 1870 but which, tragically, had to go into liquidation in 2022 as the result of an unwise decision to spread its original workshop from Wimborne and set up shop in Ashford, Kent. (The brand has since been resurrected, albeit as a very different operation.) The move left the company most of its highly skilled craftsmen, artisans who were irreplaceable and who, as Anthony told me, represented centuries of expertise and experience. The whole premise of the move had been to improve the productivity of the workshops and to allow Connolly to extend its range downwards. The bankruptcy came as a huge blow to all classic-car enthusiasts, too: losing Connolly meant not only the loss of its unique set of skills but also that of its whole heritage as a supplier to
